Not everything needs to be introduced.

EDETRI exists through relation, placement, and presence.

EDETRI moves between objects and events, constructing table-led spatial narratives where food, material, and form come together.
Its work reintroduces everyday objects through sculptural form—shifting perception without altering function.

This is not about products.

It is about how something appears,
how it occupies space,
and how it stays.

"This book does not document EDETRI.
It reads it."

Through Virtually Ever After, each moment is understood as a system of relations.

EDETRI's EVENTS

IMAGE AS EVIDENCE

Edetri constructs moments where objects, food, and space come together with apparent simplicity. Yet beneath this surface, a precise system is at work—defined by repetition, spacing, and controlled placement.

What seems intuitive is, in fact, highly considered. Each element contributes to a larger structure, where nothing is isolated and everything exists in relation.

Virtually Ever After reads this not as an event, but as a spatial system where composition, rhythm, and absence define the experience.

Dinner on a Hidden Cliff between the Sea and the Mountain

Project Objectives: Initiate Edetri’s first gathering as a format that brings people together beyond a conventional dining context. Explore the relationship between table, landscape, and participants, treating the setting as an active element of the experience. Create a table using only materials found on site, embracing immediacy, limitation, and response to place. Establish a foundation for future gatherings in unexpected locations, shaped by movement, interaction, and shared experience.

Edetri's first Table!

Fourteen people gathered around the first Edetri table. Reaching a hidden cliff with all the materials was never easy, yet the effort of getting there immediately became part of the experience itself. The gathering did not begin at the table, but in the act of arriving together, carrying a shared intention.

From the beginning, Edetri was never centered around gastronomy alone. The focus was to bring people together through sensory and aesthetic experiences, where the surrounding landscape holds as much presence as the table itself. Particular attention is drawn to places not originally designed for gatherings, where space, people, and objects can enter into a more direct relationship.

For this first experience, the table was positioned between mountain and sea, right at the edge. It was built in a raw and immediate way, using branches, stones, and fruits found on site. The evening unfolded without a fixed structure. Conversations, movement, the sea, darkness, and the return to the table gradually became part of the same continuous experience. This first gathering established an open approach to place, to people, and to the possibility of a table existing beyond its expected context.

Cafe Opening

Project Objectives: Establish a clear and distinctive atmosphere for Emi as a space shaped by exhibitions and curatorial interventions. Translate the pre-opening phase into a physical experience by working with tension, preparation, and incompleteness. Integrate Edetri ceramics into the installation as part of a larger composition, moving beyond purely functional use. Create a foundation for ongoing collaboration and future activations within the space.

Between concealment and emphasis.

Emi was conceived not as a conventional cafe, but as a fluid gathering space shaped by evolving exhibitions and curatorial interventions. Founded by two Russian creatives in Istanbul, the venue positions itself somewhere between a social hub and an ongoing exhibition.

All ceramic elements within the space were sourced from Edetri. Alongside this, Edetri was invited to shape the opening installation, defining the atmosphere of the space from its very beginning.

In the days leading up to the gathering, the environment was marked by a constant sense of in-betweenness—closed boxes, unfinished preparations, and an atmosphere suspended between process and completion. Rather than concealing this condition, the installation worked directly with it.

Fabric was tightly wrapped and tensioned with ropes, forming a layered and restrained structure. Ceramic pieces became embedded within this composition, held rather than simply displayed, as if paused in the middle of unfolding. The approach loosely recalls the language of Christo and Jeanne-Claude, where wrapping operates simultaneously as concealment and emphasis.

Held in a state of becoming.

Instead of presenting a resolved scene, the installation remained attached to the energy of becoming. It reflected the fragile threshold between preparation and opening, where nothing feels entirely settled, yet everything is already in motion.

Following the opening, the space continued to evolve through different collaborations and gatherings. Over time, EMI gradually shifted into a different kind of social and experiential environment, where objects, people, and events continuously reshaped the identity of the space itself.

Project Objectives: Expand EMI beyond a standard café format by introducing a structured, ticketed evening that enables more distinct and experience-driven gatherings. Preserve the existing café atmosphere by avoiding additional elements such as tablecloths or heavy styling, allowing the space to remain recognizable and unforced. Reinterpret the apéro format through a curated French selection and ingredient-led cocktails, creating a cohesive yet informal dining experience.

Softness arranged into structure.

As a seated apéro, structured around a fully French selection brought directly from France. The dinner unfolded as a composition of traditional elements including selected French cheeses, duck pâté, foie gras, confitures, and preserved goods, forming a tasting sequence rooted in apéro culture.

For the evening, Edetri collaborated with Sophie, mixologist and founder of Forum for Formulation, who developed two signature cocktails specifically for the gathering. Both drinks were conceived in dialogue with the ingredients and sensibility of the table itself, extending the atmosphere of the apéro into liquid form.

Traditional Sweet and Savory Crepe Dinner

Project Objectives: Translate the cultural meaning of Chandeleur into a sensory experience, using crêpes, light, and movement. Build a cohesive narrative across food, drinks, and space, aligning the menu, cocktail progression, and visual elements with the cycle of the sun.

DINNER TABLE LAYOUT

Chandeleur is a French celebration centered around crêpes, which is why the menu was built entirely around both sweet and savory variations. As a tradition goes, La Chandeleur is an invitation to celebrate the return of the sun and the nearing end of winter. It is a promise of renewal, an ode to new beginnings.

The space was marked by suspended mimosa, gently moving with the air, evoking the presence of the sun through light, color, and subtle motion.

Visibility constructed through layering.

3GMTA is an Istanbul-based brand curating a high-end vintage selection. For the launch of their website, they aimed to host a party that would also build visibility on social media. The intention was to move away from standard event language and create something aligned with the brand's identity, while still introducing unexpected elements.

The event took place in the founder's studio, where space was limited and the visibility of the products was essential. This constraint shaped our approach. Instead of using a conventional tablecloth setup, we designed a table that would immediately draw attention within a compact area, without overshadowing the pieces on display.

6-Course Ticketed Dinner in the Field

Project Objectives: Move away from the conventional “farm table” visual language of clean white tablecloths, while avoiding an overly styled or extreme approach, creating instead a table that feels grounded and in harmony with its agricultural surroundings. Reflect the rhythm and freshness of the land, allowing nature to define the spatial and sensory experience.Bring visibility to this type of field-based dining concept, which is still uncommon in Turkey, by presenting it in a clear and accessible format.

The table as an extension of the landscape.

The Farm Table series began with the idea of bringing people together in a space where nature is at the forefront, allowing them to feel the change of the season and connect directly with the food they eat! Hosting a dinner right in the fields, in a part of the farm that had never been used for dining before, made this evening even more special. Surrounded by the first harvest of autumn, it felt like the perfect way to blend our worlds. From the menu featuring the season's freshest produce to the table set in the heart of the farm, everything came together beautifully.

Event07_DARK FOREST

Tickered Private Buffet Experience

Project Objectives: Build a fully immersive table setting deep in the forest, where the environment becomes the main structure of the experience rather than a backdrop. Create a “dark” atmosphere without using black as a visual tool, relying instead on texture, density, sound, and spatial layering.

Deep within the forest, The Dark Forest Table was conceived as an immersive experience where the boundary between setting, character, and gathering dissolved into one continuous atmosphere.

The challenge of this event was to create depth and mystery without relying on black as a visual tool. Instead, the darkness was built through texture, density, sound, and layering within the forest itself. The result was a space that felt enclosed, yet alive.
Guests were invited to step into their own interpretation of a “dark character,” turning the evening into a subtle, costume-driven experience. Without being defined as a costume event, the gathering naturally evolved into a collective transformation, where each presence contributed to the overall mood.

Slow Bazaar Pop-up Opening Party

Project Objectives: Create a visible and distinctive presence within a crowded space shared by multiple brands. Design and execute a strong table setup with a limited budget.

From moment to structure.

The event begins as a moment—shaped by presence, interaction, and context. Through Virtually Ever After, it is removed, isolated, and restructured. What remains is not the event itself, but its underlying system,defined by placement, relation, and form.

Given the small scale and low ceiling of the venue, the intervention was designed to feel lightweight yet dominant, creating clarity within an intentionally busy setting. Instead of adapting to a traditional table form, the structure was composed through varying pedestals and elevations, forming an irregular, pop-up-like landscape.

A white, structural feather-like material—typically avoided in table contexts—was reinterpreted and integrated into the design, aligning with the seasonal atmosphere while creating a soft but architectural presence. The result was a suspended, textural environment rather than a conventional table.

Pişmaniye was introduced as both a visual and tactile element, while metal clips suspended from the ceiling connected the installation vertically, encouraging interaction and movement within the space. The table itself became the primary medium of expression, shaping the experience entirely through the interactive food elements placed on it.

Event09_A Magazine Curated By
25th Year Anniversary Party

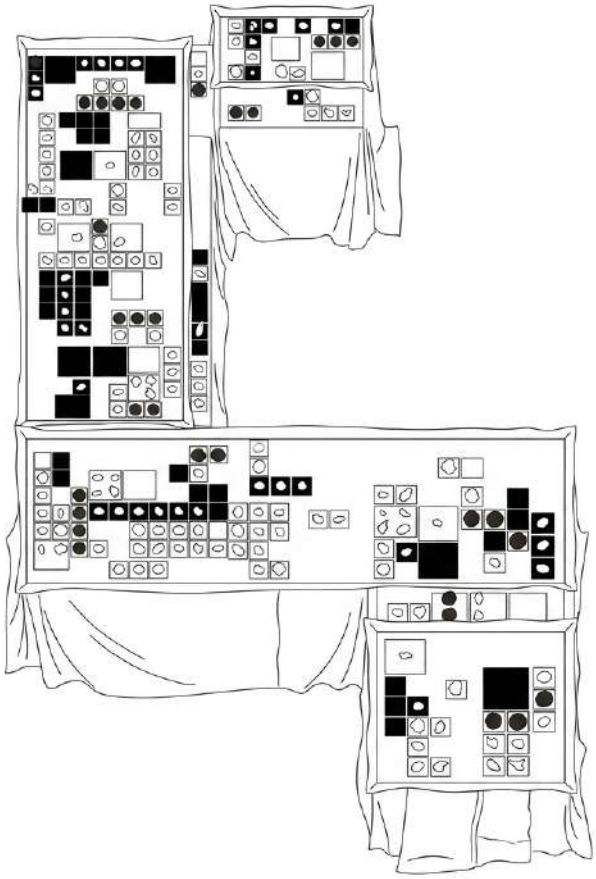

Project Objectives: Issue and the 25th anniversary, developed in dialogue with Maison Margiela. Create a strong conceptual framework that reflected the magazine's editorial identity and legacy. Introduce an element of surprise through the food experience, challenging expectations and encouraging curiosity.

Constructed Disorder

An asymmetrical buffet landscape shaped through texture, accumulation, and controlled disorder – inspired by Martin Margiela's raw approach to material, process, and deconstruction.

The first issue of A Magazine Curated By was created with Maison Martin Margiela, and the 25th anniversary issue returned to this origin. This became the main reference point. Edetri started with the idea of a raw, unfinished table, allowing textures and forms to take center stage, echoing Margiela's approach to material, process, and deconstruction.

Designed for 850 guests, the setup took the form of a large-scale buffet. Multiple tables were combined to create an asymmetrical layout, breaking away from standard linear compositions. Each table was treated individually, with custom-fitted table coverings produced through a detailed, almost couture-like process to ensure a precise fit.

For its 25th anniversary, A Magazine Curated By commissioned a holistic event where the table would act as the central element of the experience. The brief called for a strong visual impact, with a clear "wow" effect, while reflecting the magazine's history.

Lovers Among Guests

Working closely with one of our chefs based in France, we developed the concept of stone-shaped edible forms. Significant time was dedicated to the composition, texture, and visual language of these “stones,” resulting in eight variations of sweet and savory elements. Each piece was designed to resemble sculpted stones, both in appearance and structure, while remaining entirely plant-based and gluten-free. Guests were invited to explore and interact with them as tactile objects on the table.

Edetri’s Lovers were integrated as part of this overall setup, becoming an essential component of the composition and contributing to the visual and experiential coherence of the event.

Event10_The Jelly Project

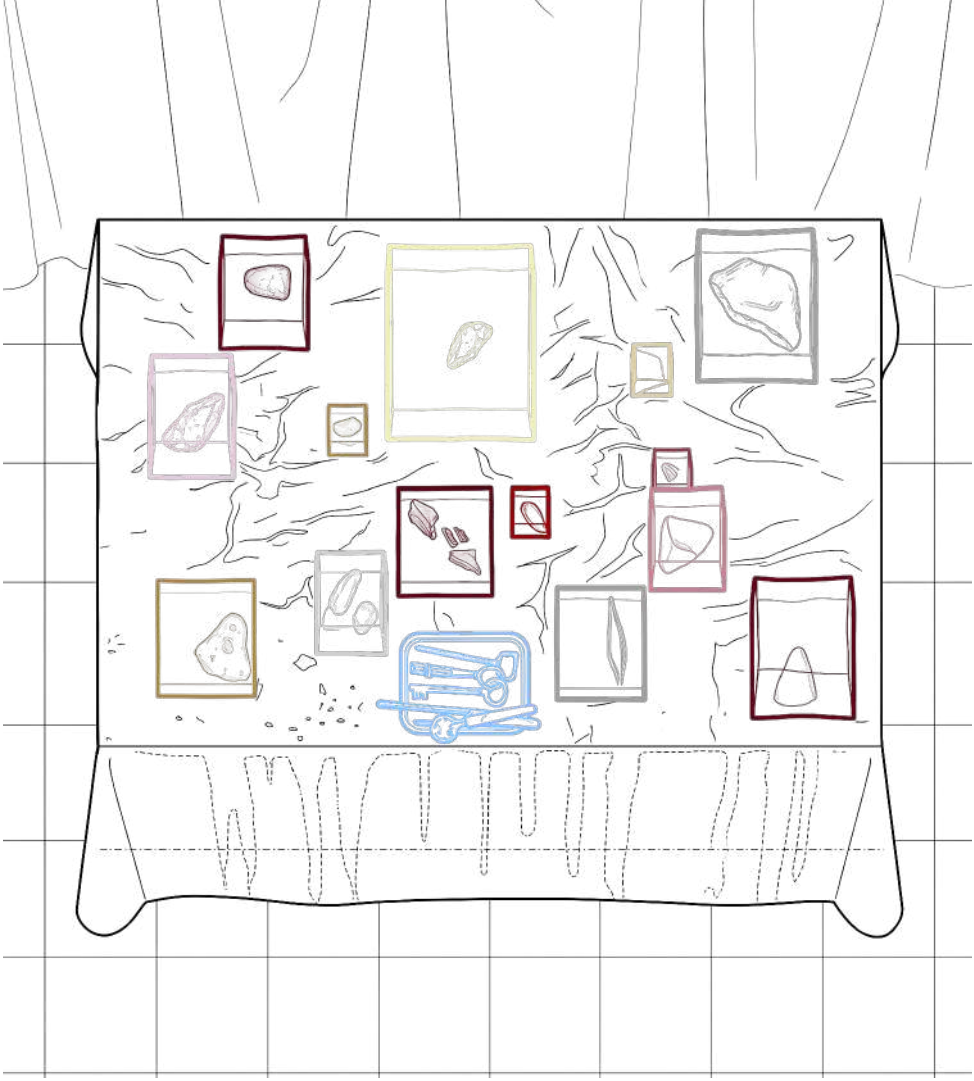

Ticketed Event

Project Objectives: Create a format where participants could directly intervene and interact with the table. Use the event as a platform to present my experiments with jelly in varying flavors, densities and levels of clarity.

This event was conceived with a stronger focus on experience, placing direct interaction at its core. Working with edible, vegan biomaterials, Edetri developed a series of highly transparent jellies in varying textures, densities, and unexpected flavor profiles, including pickled brine, sherbet, and alcohol-infused variations. Each jelly contained a stone, positioned as a symbolic core within a soft, mutable structure.

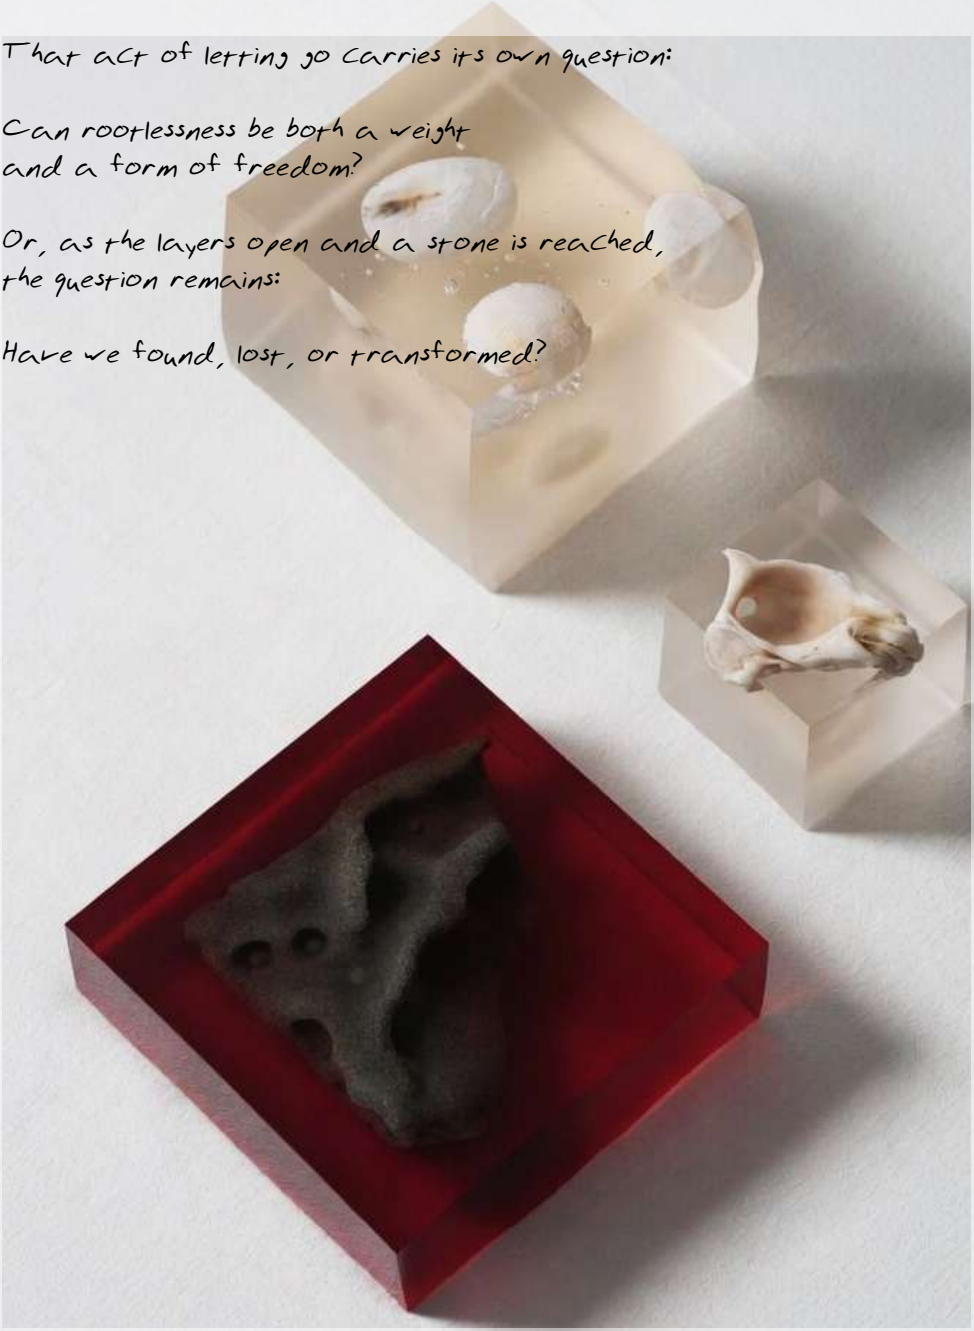

Guests were invited to select the jelly and stone they felt closest to, creating an immediate personal entry point. The stone suggested a sense of stability, an inner core that resists change or remains out of reach, while the jelly acted as a shifting, permeable layer around it.

That act of letting go carries its own question:

Can rootlessness be both a weight and a form of freedom?

Or, as the layers open and a stone is reached,
the question remains:

Have we found, lost, or transformed?

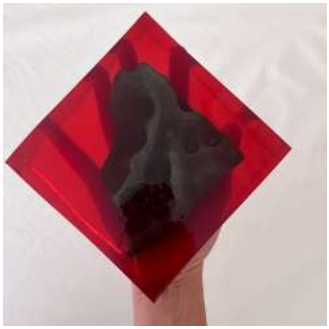

Interaction followed naturally. Participants touched, cut, broke, and reshaped the jellies, gradually revealing the stone and altering the form through their own decisions. The setup functioned as an open field rather than a fixed sequence. Some chose to preserve the structure, others disrupted it, merged elements, or let them dissolve. The contrast between fluid and more rigid textures, combined with the intensity of the flavors, created moments of tension, discomfort, and release.

Through these actions, the experience explored ideas of stability and transformation, control and letting go. The stone remained as an unchanging core, while the jelly, despite its defined shape, continuously shifted, inviting participants to confront what can be held, what resists touch, and what inevitably dissolves.

Project Objectives: Organize an intimate house party with an artistic table setup. Create a table arrangement that allowed a couple who has a design studio to present their own egg holder and candlestick pieces. Incorporate cultural references linked to Hong Kong, reflecting one of the hosts' background.

Existing surfaces,

For their housewarming in Istanbul, Dilara and Bodin invited Edetri to create a table using pieces developed within their own studio, including egg holders, candle holders, and sauce trays. The intention was to construct a gathering that could simultaneously reflect their home, their practice, and the atmosphere surrounding both. Rather than covering the existing marble table with conventional elements, the composition worked in direct relation to the material already present in the space. Thick bases and elevated placements were introduced to create a layered structure, allowing the objects to remain visible while becoming part of a more unified arrangement.

The food direction was developed in reference to Bodin's Hong Kong background, shaping the menu through a more personal and contextual approach.

Ticketed Experience

Project Objectives: Transform mushroom foraging at peak station into a ritualistic experience. Create an interactive format rooted in collective participation.Bring the table into nature as part of the experience.

Foraged Rituals

A shared woodland gathering shaped through foraging, collective composition, and tactile interaction with the landscape.

This event was built around the act of foraging at the peak of mushroom season. We brought the group into the forest and gave each guest a basket, inviting them to collect mushrooms directly from the landscape. While they were collecting mushrooms, we prepared the table nearby. Focaccias and chips, prepared in advance with the chef, were placed into custom boxes and wrapped in fabric, like ritualistic, Japanese-inspired lunch boxes, becoming part of the setting.

When everyone returned, the first moment unfolded around the ground composition. Each person placed their mushrooms on the ground one by one, forming a shared display where the variety expanded and everyone could take time to observe each form closely.

Guests placed their mushrooms together, forming a shared field of different shapes, colors, and textures. This became both a point of interaction and introduction, as people met each other through what they had collected.

For this store opening, the brief was to create a table and overall setup that would align strictly with the brand's color palette: champagne, red, and black.

Beyond this, the expectation was to move away from recognizable "food" visuals and transform the offering into a more immersive and surprising experience. Edetri developed a concept based on repetition and a futuristic visual language. Using a single plate model across the table, custom-printed sticker-backed surfaces were applied to create a unified yet layered effect. In parallel, we added custom futuristic glass plates, reinforcing the overall direction.

For gifting, a wrist-worn napkin was developed using the brand's own fabrics and featuring its logo. Guests used it during the event and later took it with them, extending the experience beyond the space.

Event15_EPHEMERAL DYADIC

Origins Gathering

Project Objectives: Increase the Brand’s visibility within the Turkish market. Introduce a collection of nine perfumes built around distinctive ingredients. Highlight the founder’s identity as both perfumer and painter, expanding his artistic visibility.

Ephemeral Dyadic is a globally recognized fragrance brand with strong international sales, yet still relatively unknown in Turkey and often perceived as foreign, despite its artist-founder. The brief was to establish the brand’s presence locally through an event where its nine perfumes could be more visible, understood, and experienced.

Edetri approached the project holistically, designing both the table and the overall spatial experience. The table incorporated the brand's own packaging papers as both material and narrative elements, enhanced with eyelet details to create a knitting-like texture, and the entire table was wrapped in a stainless steel surface. The food was developed in close alignment with the brand identity. Chefs created an avant-garde menu inspired by the perfumes and their color palette.

The experience area was designed as both the spatial anchor of the event and the starting point of the game. Constructed with wall-mounted metal structures adapted to the limited space, it functioned as an architectural surface where display, interaction, and storytelling merged. This area first operated as the fragrance testing zone, where guests encountered the nine perfumes of Ephemeral Dyadic.

Alongside the scents, custom tailor-made fabric pieces, finished with needle lace edges, became the starting point of an interactive game. Guests tested perfumes directly on these fabrics, selected their preferred scent, and followed a sequence of instructions guiding them through a multi-layered gifting system, forming a charm with the perfume.

After selecting a fragrance, the chosen fabric was removed from a hanging system and led to a numbered instruction card corresponding to the perfume. This guided guests to a 9-drawer unit, where each drawer contained single-edition word cards reflecting moods and associations of that specific scent. Guests selected one card and attached it to their fabric piece, completing the second layer of the charm.

The drawer system then led to a final step: hand-drawn artworks by the brand's founder, also organized per perfume. Each guest selected one drawing to add as the third element. The experience concluded with the perfume itself, completing a layered, collectible object formed through interaction, choice, and progression.

Rather than offering a single gift, the experience transformed gifting into a treasure hunt-like journey. This structure created a more personal and memorable connection with the brand, while naturally encouraging interaction and social media visibility.

Against a puffy landscape of bedsheets and unopened boxes, softness and structure entered into dialogue through a quiet domestic composition. Rather than concealing the temporary state of the apartment, the setup embraced it, transforming moving boxes into part of the ritual itself. OBJECT AS A PRESENCE

Objects do not simply exist.
They hold space, and shape
what surrounds them.

Edetri approaches objects not as decorative elements, but as extensions of everyday rituals.

Defined by clarity of form and a sculptural sensibility, each piece holds a balance between function and expression, remaining usable while carrying a distinct presence.

Their meaning does not lie in isolation, but in the relationships they create—between one another, the surface they rest on, and the moment they become part of.

Through Virtually Ever After, these objects are read as part of a larger system, where form, placement, and proximity transform them into a spatial language rather than singular pieces.

Visual Weight, Physical Lightness

Behind the sculptural appearance, particular attention was given to lightness and balance. Although the objects appear solid and grounded, they were carefully developed to feel almost weightless in the hand. This contrast between visual density and physical fragility became part of the experience itself—introducing a subtle sense of surprise at the moment of contact.

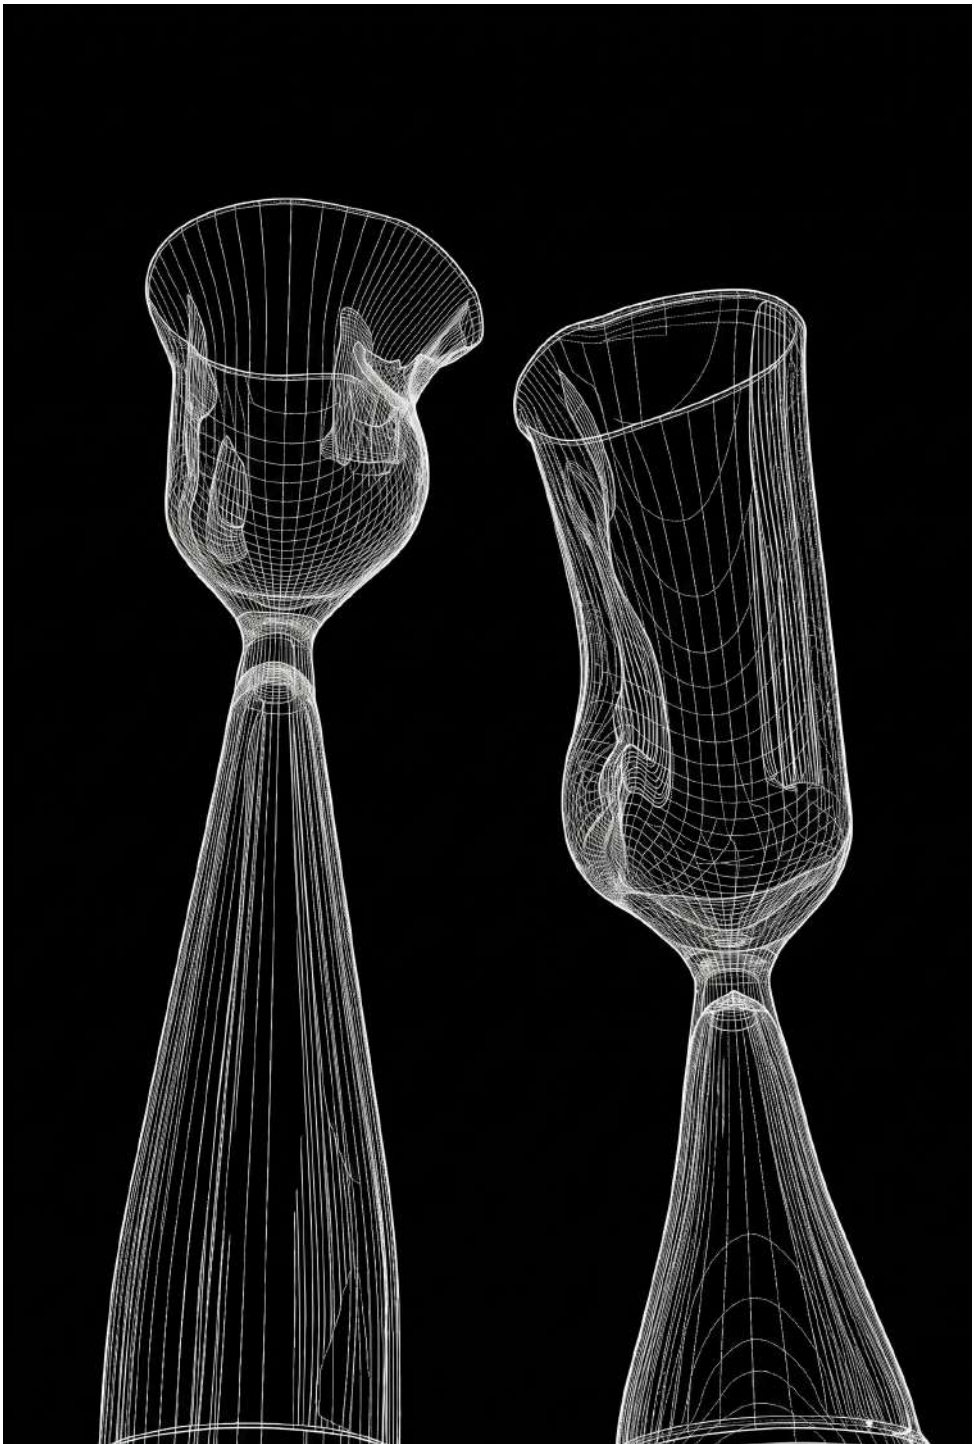

Their relationship is defined by intimacy, echoing the dynamic between two bodies that remain distinct while finding balance together. While sculptural in presence, the pieces retain their functional clarity, allowing use without losing their expressive character.

LOVERS is Edetri's first glass piece and carries its name deliberately.
The set consists of two objects whose forms appear to kiss, support and rely on each other, creating a quiet dialogue between closeness and independence.

Product03_LOVERS_2023

Product04_Dis-Moi_2024

The collection consists of two versions. One is made from clear glass. The other is produced through a nickel plating technique, where nickel is applied within the glass during the making process, giving the surface a metallic appearance while preserving the material's transparency and depth.

The Glass with a single drinking point that symbolizes the center of a dialog. Much like the moment finding that match point that's got the conversation flowing.

The surface follows parallel lines inspired by Carlo Scarpa, particularly those frequently used in the Brion Tomb, and his layered architectural language.

With SCARPA GLASSES, Edetri moves away from the organic softness of blown glass toward a more defined, functional and architectural approach to crystal, introducing the material for the first time in its glass practice.

Products_Scarpa_2025

When the glass is slightly tilted, the lines of the rim, the grip and the foot visually align into a single, continuous line.

The parallel lines at the rim create an optical illusion, giving the impression of a fractured gap, as if the surface were split along its length and the liquid inside could spill through. Each piece is hand-shaped, embracing subtle variation as part of its character.

Choreographed Objects

A moving composition where gesture, precision, and crystal objects became part of a carefully staged spatial performance.

The crystal used in the Scarpa series is sourced from Czechia, a region known for its long-standing crystal craftsmanship. Each piece is shaped with attention to precision and proportion, allowing material, surface and line to work together in a restrained and deliberate way.

Virtually ever after did not approach this book as documentation.

It was conceived as a way of reading EDETRI through space, relation, rhythm, and form. By isolating gestures, objects, and compositions from the temporality of the event, the book transforms gatherings into spatial systems—where presence, placement, and interaction become part of a larger visual language.
